Accessing Benefits & Supports for Older Adults with Long COVID

RESOURCE GUIDE • July 2022

Older Adults & Long COVID

Most individuals with COVID-19 get better within weeks, but some continue to experience symptoms that can persist for a long time after their initial recovery, or may even develop new symptoms. This condition is commonly referred to as “long COVID” and can impact anyone, even those who only had mild symptoms. According to the CDC, health inequities may put some populations at greater risk for developing post-COVID conditions.

The severity of long COVID can range from mild to incapacitating and may sometimes result in disability. One in four adults age 65 and older who survive COVID-19 are estimated to develop long COVID. Those experiencing long COVID may need significant resources and supports to maintain economic security, access healthcare, and live independently. Legal assistance, elder rights, and aging services providers can play a role to help those with long COVID, and this resource guide provides links to information, trainings, and resources that can assist advocates in addressing a wide range of issues.

Income Supports and Benefits

Older adults and others with long COVID may experience a loss in household income due to an inability to work or other financial impact caused by increased expenses. Advocates can assist by screening for benefits eligibility and helping individuals apply or seek new benefits, such as Social Security Disability Benefits.

Access to Health Care

Individuals with long COVID generally benefit from health care services that include multidisciplinary teams from a range of specialties to address the issues of COVID-19 recovery. Long-COVID or Post-COVID Care Centers (PCCCs) are available in some regions and 18 clinics have been established at Veterans Administration facilities. Advocates can assist older adults by connecting them to such clinics and advocating for health care coverage for treatment of long COVID.
Housing

A loss in household income or increased expenses due to long COVID can also lead to housing instability. Advocates working with older adults should screen for potential housing issues that could lead to eviction or mortgage foreclosure. Older adults in income-based housing may find it useful to request an interim reexamination of rent as a result of “circumstances impacting adjusted annual income that occur between reexaminations.” Housing counselors can also take much needed steps to help older adults access pandemic-related relief funds or programs, and legal assistance attorneys can provide representation in housing court if needed.

Consumer Protection

Older adults with long COVID may also find that it is difficult to keep up with bills, resulting in debt collection issues. Additionally, some may be targeted for COVID-related scams that claim to offer treatment for COVID-19 symptoms or other products. Advocates working with older adults can help by raising awareness of scams, advocating for consumer rights, and deploying strategies to respond to fraud.
Conclusion & Additional Resources

There are many ways that legal assistance, elder rights, and aging services professionals can help older adults who are experiencing long COVID. Screening and addressing the wide range of associated issues outlined in this resource sheet and beyond can help older adults thrive as they grow older and remain at home and in their communities.
